

The answer to the Toyota Celica DRL placement in relation to the direction signal is so obvious that it is just plain silly.

We all know that there is no honest justification for daytime running lights, therefore just disconnect the DRL voltage to the lamps and the problem is solved, no expensive redesign of the lights, and some savings for Toyota in DRL wiring hardware, and the added safety for all drivers on the roads of America.